

Time Management Struggle Problem Statement

Author: Trenton Braley

Problem Statement:

Even though there are a lot of time management tools out there, working college students still can't find one that actually fits their constantly changing schedules.

Who is experiencing the problem?

- College students, especially freshmen, who are trying to manage classes and work. It's really hard for students who have part-time jobs or random work shifts.

What is the problem?

- The problem is that most of the current tools don't let students easily adjust their schedules when their work shifts change or when they get extra assignments. It's super frustrating to have to keep changing everything around.

Where does the problem present itself?

- This happens whenever students have to juggle between work and school, like during midterms or finals when work hours go up or when group projects and exams are scheduled back-to-back.

Why does it matter?

- When students can't manage their time, they end up missing assignments, feeling super stressed out, and falling behind in both school and work. A tool that actually works with their crazy schedules could help them stay on top of everything and avoid burnout.
